

Carol Bouyoucos
Mt. Kisco, New York.

I shoot with an iPhone then manipulate my photographs using various in-phone apps. The final retouching and composition happens in Photoshop. I work with various materials like archival rag paper, acrylic, silk, wax, and reclaimed wood as a device to remove the work from a solely photographic conversation.

Much of my work is inspired by early landscape, portraiture, and botanical art. Weaving historical imagery into the narrative embeds a feeling of nostalgia, whereas working within a digital platform invites my viewer to consider a new perception of the story. I live on a Sanctuary property, and observing nature every day through the lens, I have begun to notice the cumulative changes in the landscape. There is almost a prehistoric feeling to the geography - vines out of control choking great trees; invasive plants that spill over paths and highways. Trees with weakened root masses are ripped from the ground during storms and left in the aftermath. The natural world is ferocious, rebellious and fascinating!

I am influenced by artists like Thomas Cole, Frederick Edwin Church, and Robert John Thornton whose work illustrates an America that inspired awe in a time when expansionism was taking over the west. Environmental and social borderlines are as conflicted today, but history has taught us that contemplating nature can compel humanity to work toward change.
